No one can look into Fort Vigilance even for the moment of a casual giance, without the conviction that its garrison are men acting under the stern, moral sense that they are engaged in the determined discharge of conscientions duty. The narrow bourds occupied by twelve hundred men, unaccustomed to the novelty of such circumstances, are still as a church. No jest or laughter is heard, and the only sounds which disturb the quiet of the camp are the tramp of armed men, and the voices of the officers giving the drill commands to the companies they are constantly exercising in the use of these arms. Old gray-haired men—gentiemen of wealth and standing in the community—may be seen standing quietly up to wearisone sentinel duty, or going through the drill alongside of their vonner community of the vonner commu cade, and artillerymen stand at the piece which command all approaches to the camp company of four to take a blacksmith living mear.
